Dedicated to

Iris Atlee

my granddaughter
who has the challenge and opportunity to participate in making a world
so much better than the world she was born into

The Grand Challenge is global unsustainability.

National security and the bridge to resilience have just as much to do with food, water, the built environment, transportation, education, health care, and the physical solvency of our nation as some bad guy sitting in some dark corner plotting whatever deed he's going to do.

Marine Colonel Mark Puck Mykleby former Special Strategic Assistant to the Chairman of the US Joint Chiefs of Staff

The development of a worldview which will respond to the challenge of our times requires an imaginative recognition of humanity's fundamental participation in the natural world, a recognition of the way the human person, mind and body, is engaged in a co-creative dance with the primeval givenness of the cosmos.

In this vision humanity is nature rendered self-conscious, one part of the cosmos capable of reflecting on itself, which has evolved so it stands on the threshold of conscious participation in the unfolding of the whole.

Peter Reason

The way we'll hold it together is to hold it – together.

Sarah Crowell

Acknowledgements

Thanks to my friend and colleague Janette Hartz-Karp for the impetus to write this book, for the phrase “participatory sustainability” and for support during and after the actual writing. Thanks to Gail Miller for proofreading and editorial help. Thanks to my friends at the Co-Intelligence Institute and Walnut Street Cooperative and to Dulcy Lee for ongoing companionship.

And thanks to those unborn and unnamed people who will feel called to ensure the curation, preservation, use and evolution of all knowledge that could help build something better from the raw material that we will leave them.
